' emphasizes that responsibility for bringing new products to market belongs to every business function within an enterprise. These functions include not only product development but also manufacturing, information technology systems, leadership, customer service and customer relations, quality control, operations, legal oversight, and research. His goal is to bridge the gap between managers and engineers so that the entire organization works as a team. Frances has worked for companies that are well known for innovative products. Hence his advice is filled with practical insight, and he offers specific, concrete "ideas for action" ' . ' If you want a peek at the future of how products will be developed and distributed, look no further than the Foot Locker, or other athletic equipment retail outlets at your local mall. Not long ago, if you wanted a sports shoe, you went to a department or discount store where you were fitted with a conventional shoe. . Today the customer is greeted by a salesperson specializing in athletic shoes. They do not ask your shoe size, but your lifestyle, and brand allegiances and sports style and foot style. After this audit you are shown a few shoes, and you narrow down your preferences based on this ' . This is the way marketing will be in the future . not an offering of many products , but a...
